"Thank goodness! You're back at last!" cried Mum, her face brightening. She called Bobby loudly but no response. To make the vague(模糊的) shape in the distance sharp and clear, Mum then rubbed(摩擦) her eyes, only to find her real son Dubby standing there, (feeling guilty). Not until the moment they met each other again did she realize that the whole sequence(片段) was an allegorical(寓言的) dream. She just missed her real son so much that she dreamt what she thought about in the day. Watching his son' s face, she was reminded of the days — suffering his rebelling and being ignored by Dubby in his growth, and then turned a back to him, aggrievedly(委屈地). Dubby was urged/pushed by his father to apologize and comfort his mother. He entered the room, approached his mother, and offered the same dessert/treat the mother gave the steamed bun. Upon seeing the red bean bread (brought by her son), the mother seemed to forgive him and forgot the unpleasant. The two figures cuddled (拥抱) closer, enjoying the dessert and the evening twilight(暮光) as if (they were) taking the memory travel boat back to the days when two remarkable stars, mother and son, were twinkling/glittering in the night.

Compared with studying in China, going abroad for further education is someone's preference. Because in their view not only can they widen their horizon by going abroad, but also they can experience western culture and civilization in person-personally. On the contrary, considering their future career, others would rather study in China. What is increasingly taken into consideration by the students insisting on studying in China is that (building (up) domestic relationships and gaining local experience) are extremely essential.

Accordingly=Therefore, what is it that we are supposed to-should choose?
